

George Daniels and Roger Smith TO CREATE LIMITED EDITION WRISTWATCH

George Daniels, the English watchmaker who invented the co-axial escapement 35 years ago, is to create a series of limited edition wristwatches, signed “Daniels,” with his former apprentice Roger Smith. Smith, as readers of this magazine likely know, is himself a master independent watchmaker with a significant following. The new pieces are to draw from the best of Daniels’s style, with no exceptions made in terms of their quality. What we know now is that they will be made in rose gold in a series of thirty-five and will closely resemble a pocket watch Daniels made in 1994. Daniels and Smith expect to complete their prototype this September. Stay tuned to International Watch for developments on the project.
